The Republican Party Train Station: “All board, ...”

By “A Common Man”

May 3, 2009

I heard on TV that all Republicans needed to go down to the Republican Party train station and get onboard.

When I arrived at the RP train station, I asked where should I go, and was told, “the trains are boarding now, go through those doors, out on the platform, and get on one of the trains.” As I moved out onto the platform, I saw a train, to my left and a train to my right, with lines of people loading up on each train.

I thought to myself, “which train should I get on?” Then I noticed that there was a sign at the door of each train where the people were getting onboard. The sign on the train to my left said, “Moderate Republican Train, Conservatives Are Welcome, But You Will Have To Check Some Of Your Values And Issues, At The Door!”. Then I looked to the train on my right and saw a similar sign, “Conservative Republican Train, Moderates Are Welcome, But You Will Have To Check Some Of Your Values And Issues, At The Door”.

What a dilemma! Then I saw a familiar face on the Moderate train, Senator John McCain. He seemed to notice my uncertainty and called out to me, “Hey Amigo, come get on this train, we are going to Washington to work with the Democrats, in a bipartisan way, to get things done. Yea, we will have to compromise with our good friends, the liberal Democrats, but we will get something done for you, and besides, I'm an expert at compromising with the Democrats, they love me." I called back to him, "You mean, like amnesty for illegal aliens?" He responded, "Yea, but let's call it "comprehensive immigration reform", that other word offends the poor illegals, and besides, if you can't beat 'em, you might as well join 'em, right?"

Then I remembered why I was disappointed and discouraged when the Republican Party nominated John "Maverick" McCain, for the Republican Party candidate for president and what a tough vote that was.

And right there and then, I made a decision. I'm tired of voting for candidates that tell me I have to compromise my beliefs and positions on the issues, in order to be bipartisan. I do not want to be bipartisan. I want my representatives to adopt a tireless, relentless, aggressive, united, vocal, opposition to all the liberal forces and their agenda to drastically change the country that I love, the United States of America. I decided that I belong on the Conservative Republican train.

If the Republican Party decides to be the voice of "moderation", I'm out.

However, if the Republican Party decides to be the voice of "conservatism", I will work my heart out, to save my country.

So, the big questions are yet to be answered. Which train will you board? Which train represents the majority of the Republican Party? Will the Republican Party simply become the right wing of the Democrat Party? If the conservative base is continually dismissed by the Republican Party, will they form a Conservative Republican Party?

It's all too complicated, for a common man, like me, but I did get on the "right" train.
